

Kimberly Marten is a professor of political science at Barnard College, Columbia University, with expertise in international security, Russia, and the global politics of climate change. She is a faculty member and executive committee member of Columbia's Harriman Institute for Russian, Eurasian and East European Studies, and Saltzman Institute of War and Peace Studies. Her recent publications analyze the Wagner Group and other Russian paramilitaries; Russian actions in the Middle East, Latin America and Africa; Russia/NATO relations and the Russian reaction to NATO enlargement; and the politics of the changing Arctic. She has testified before Congress three times on Russia-related issues and has written four books, including Engaging the Enemy: Organization Theory and Soviet Military Innovation (Princeton, 1993), which received the Marshall Shulman Prize. Beyond over 30 academic journal articles and book chapters, she has written more than 50 policy analyses in the Washington Quarterly, Survival, Foreign Affairs, War on the Rocks, Lawfare, the New York Times, the Guardian, and the New Republic, among others. The Council on Foreign Relations commissioned her special report, Reducing Tensions between Russia and NATO (2017), and the Center for a New American Security commissioned her co-authored report on Potential Russian Uses of Paramilitaries in Eurasia (2024). She gives frequent invited presentations to the policy community, and appeared on The Daily Show with Jon Stewart. She earned her A.B. at Harvard and Ph.D. at Stanford. She is a member of the Council on Foreign Relations and received a CFR/Hitachi International Affairs Fellowship in Japan (2000).
