

Farah Stockman

Farah Stockman is a domestic correspondent for the New York Times. She has previously been a columnist and editorial writer at the Boston Globe. Stockman joined the Boston Globe in 2000 and served for seven years as the chief foreign policy reporter, covering the State Department, the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq, the London subway bombings, and detentions in Guantanamo Bay. She began her journalistic career interning with a New York Times reporter in Nairobi in 1997. Stockman won the Eugene C. Pulliam fellowship to write a series of columns about the fortieth anniversary of court-ordered busing in Boston. In 2016, that series of columns won the Pulitzer Prize for commentary. Stockman is the founder of Jitegemee, an educational program for homeless Kenyan children. She graduated from Harvard University in 1996 with a degree in social studies and African history.